This is a little tale about the way a man can posture to try to make himself appear smarter. We all know people like that.

Michael Kress says

I suppose this first-person narrative is called 'Mystification' because one of the main characters, the Baron Ritzner Von Jung, acted so mysteriously that it piqued everybody's curiosity as to what he was really like. Everyone at the narrator's university becomes excited when they find out that he will be visiting. After he has been staying there for a while, Von Jung gets into a heated argument at a party with a man named Johan Hermann about the 'duello,' which is the study of the rules and art of dueling. After the party, they continue the debate with a series of letters, using the narrator as a medium. It turns out that Hermann didn't know much about the topic at all and was really just kind of being a blow-hard, so it proves what lengths some people will go to to show that they are smarter than others.

If this doesn't sound interesting to you, it's because it isn't. This is one of the few books on here that has an average rating of less than three stars, so it's good to know that I wasn't the only one who disliked it. It didn't have the darkness and creepiness that I expect from an Edgar Allan Poe horror story. The only redeeming quality is that it had the same eloquent prose that I have come to admire in all of Poe's tales. He's a great author, and I've given him some good reviews, but it's definitely hit-or-miss.

Boring. I forgot it almost as soon as I was done reading it.

Basically it's about two men trying to prove who is smarter. Yawn.
