This book was written for early intermediate grades, around third grade. I chose this fiction book because it just starts to go introduce the genre of science fiction because it discusses space and stars and spaceships. This book is about a mouse names Geronimo Stilton and the adventures he has trying to find the elfix that has disappeared that us needed for the Night of the Dancing Stars. I chose this book because the text inside is very fun. On any given page some of the text is different colors and different fonts to emphasize it. The color pictures are also very fun.

Every year on the Night of the Dancing Stars, the Elfex bring toys to all of the creatures in the universe. When they are imperiled and send out a help message that is intercepted by Geronimo Stiltonix and the MouseStar1, the crew rushes to save this important holiday. Twinklax has been attacked by Nebulos, who gloom and doom has clouded their own planet and obscured them from the view of the Elfex, resulting in a decided lack of gifts. Angered by this, they take over the Elfex production and claim all of the presents for their own. Geronimo is able to make them see reason, and once their moods improve, their entire demeanor changes and they are able to let the Elfex return to making the Night of the Dancing Stars merry for everyone.

This is an interesting twist on a holiday story. Clearly, this is the Christmas of Stiltonix's world, and Christmix just didn't have the right ring to it. There are decorated trees, candy canes, and all of the traditional trappings while calling this by a different name.

The SpaceMice stories are the simplest ones-- they have a mission, they head out on it, solve all of the problems, and return in time for feasts and the approbation of Grandfather William, the space captain and the admiration of Sally, Geronimo's crush in this incarnation.

Since any gift giving holiday is popular with young readers, no matter what the holiday is, I can see this being a great addition to titles like Thaler's The Christmas Party from the Black Lagoon, McDonald's Holly Jolliday, or other Christmas versions of favorite series.
