I really liked this book, I read this book last semester in one of my Child Life class. I was glad that I got the chance to read this book again for this class. My teacher who used to be a Child Life Specialist actually used this book with her patients. This book teaches kids all the steps about how to live with diabetes. It walks through how to measure blood sugar, how to inject insulin, and how to keep someone's energy level up. This book is used to help kids feel less nervous about having diabetes and helps prepare them for living life with it. I would use this in a hospital because it is a great way to teach a patient who has diabetes what all they will need to do. I would start off reading the book then I would bring in a medical doll and all the materials they will use when they start to give themselves insulin and measure their blood sugar. I would walk them through what everything was and then would let them practice measuring blood sugar on the doll, parent, or me. Finally, I would teach them about the insulin and allow them to practice where they would give it to themselves on the doll. It is a great way to get kids more familiarized with their condition and make them more comfortable with doing this everyday.

We have many diabetic students at our school, so at the beginning of the year we try to talk to the classes about what that means. A parent of a diabetic student came and read this to our students last year. She highly recommended it.

This book is great to add to a science unit about the human body and how sicknesses occur. It talks about what diabetes is and how to help someone who has diabetes in a time of need. It talks about diet, exercise and fearing near someone who is diabetic.
