'I don't believe in afterlife, although I am bringing a change of underwear.'

- Woody Allen - Getting Even

Do you believe in life after death? There are a great many people in the world today who have had near-death experiences, which makes this subject particularly fascinating, and not just to those in the scientific and medical professions.

The question has to be: Are you a sceptic or a believer or are you, like so many people, sitting on the fence?

One thing is for sure, near-death experiences have held an enduring fascination for people throughout time, probably in the main because we yearn to know that we exist after the body has died. As the medical world has become more and more sophisticated in its resuscitation techniques, a greater number of us are surviving and being brought back 'from death's door', and the incidents of near-death experiences are therefore rising.

For many people who have had a near-death experience the after effects can be psychologically profound and have a huge impact on the way they conduct their lives thereafter. Inspiring stories abound of how a life has been transformed by the experience of an NDE. Often the experiencer finds their priorities in life have changed, for example, they find they do not place such emphasis on acquiring worldly goods but do place more emphasis on their relationships with their friends, their families, their lovers.

Many studies have been, and continue to be, undertaken by dedicated doctors and scientists the world over to try to understand more about the near-death experience. Although there is no doubt that a lot of data has been, and is still being, acquired, to date a lot of the results being analysed only produce theoretical opinion.

One of the main uncertainties about life after death and the occurrence of the NDE is that it can be very difficult to prove that the event took place whilst the patient was actually clinically dead. It could be for example that an operation was of a two hour duration but the patient was only actually clinically dead for ten minutes. It is actually very difficult to prove that the NDE occurred within that ten minute timeframe.

It has often been said that of those who have reported NDEs the most interesting group is children.

The sceptic might suggest that an adult could perhaps have imagined a near-death experience based on their own personal views. But children are often too young to have any beliefs regarding death and the afterlife. Many studies have been undertaken regarding children's near-death experiences and it is generally felt that a child under five years old is too young to have had any real concept of death and the afterlife, and yet so often their experiences are similar to that of an adult. Food for thought!

Near-death experiences are one of those interesting topics that we see cropping up from time to time in news stories, both on the Internet and in newspapers. Whilst they may be of interest we often take the subject no further as the material provided is quite conflicting.

In this book we have collected together ten of some of the most noteworthy NDE stories which have appeared all around the world, be they in newspapers, journals, or on the Internet.

Whilst there will always be sceptics, these stories if nothing else serve to spark our interest and lead us to ponder a bit further.

Wow!

Wow!

I really enjoyed this book. I am glad I read it. I truly hope that my mother was able to see her relatives when she passed away and that she saw Jesus and the light as described by the people who contributed their stories in this book.
