The Politician And The Girl From The Coffee Shop Terry Towers

While twenty-one year old, Jessie knows better than to get involved with the customers, she can't help herself when it comes to the sexy and highly charismatic Senator Jeff Morrow. Despite their casual daily flirtations, she realizes that Washington's most eligible bachelor is way out of her league and would never be seriously interested in the young virgin from the coffee shop. Or would he?

So, there is a definite consistency with this series that makes me realize they shouldn't be read back-to-back. The story in this one was extremely like the first, but still sexy as all hell.

Terry Towers writes perfect smutty shorts. Mmmmmmmhm.

Reese says

Simple and straightforward!

To me Terry always does a great job writing these story, but I always want more of the story from her. I read almost all the books in this series, there are three that are my favorite. These book is one of them. I like characters and the story line in the book. I very much enjoy read the book!! Keep up the writing the book and I will keep reading them....

There is undeniable charisma between Jessie and Jeff, but Jeff is a Senator. For 2-months their relationship has been under wraps, until Jeff's advisor finds out. Jessie is asked to walk away from their relationship to protect his image. However, Jeff has other ideas. I thoroughly enjoyed this story and received an advance copy as part of the Shades of Surrender set.

Jessie is a young woman who works in the coffee shop. Each day she gets to serve the hot young politician, Senator Jeff Morrow.

Each day, Senator Jeff Morrow, gets his coffee from the coffee shop where the cute young barista serves him.

Every day they flirt with each other, knowing that nothing can come of it. But can nothing come of it? Really enjoyed this story.

This book was ok. Loved the first one much more. Can't wait to read the next one.

This book is short but steamy. I liked the first one a little better, but this second in the coffee shop series was pretty cute. I actually wish they were a little longer because there isn't a lot of depth, but it's great if you aren't in the mood for an emotional book.

The Politician and the Girl from the Coffee Shop By Terry Towers

I received this in as an ARC in the box set Shades of Surrender: Fifty by Fifty 4 A BDSM Romance Boxed Set for an honest review. I will try not to post spoilers but something may slip. The other thing is I did rate each book and will keep coming back till all are rated, both singles and this set.

This book has a nice upbeat to the start of it which keeps going as you move into the story.

I have to say this story is cute. It has a couple of hot scenes but the main man is not overtly Dominate. The story is well written, nice plot but it sounds more like a fairy tale about some tail then a romance novel. Yes, the 21 year old is a virgin (old news) and he is the older man.

But it sounds more like a fairy tale with the ending rushed. It has no grammar or spelling mistakes, a strong plot.. but it lacks meat to the story. I wish I could honestly give this story more then 3 stars but even that is pushing it as it is super short.

I was actually surprised how much I liked this. I can't think of anything more tedious than keeping company with a politician. The difficulties with a high profile politician taking up with a hostess of a coffee shop are fairly obvious. I liked the fact that Jeff really seemed to care for Jesse, as he stuck with her after they became intimate. Being that their relationship was still hidden from the public eye, he could have easily walked away at that point.

While sweet, sexy and pretty, I'm still not sure what Jesse brought to the table on an intellectual level. He agreed with her suggestion that she was basically an escape for him. She was happy to play the role of a diversion from his stressful public life. She certainly seemed to have no interest in his politics. The only things that seemed to emerge from her mouth were about how hot he was and how horny he made her. Wait a minute...with that last statement, I can see why he enjoyed his conversations with her and found them immensely satisfying!

Twenty-one year old, Jessie has been working at the coffee shop to save for college. While she knows better than to get involved with the customers, she can't help herself when it comes to the sexy and highly charismatic Senator Jeff Morrow. Despite their casual daily flirtations, she realizes that Washington's most eligible bachelor is way out of her league and would never be seriously interested in the young virgin from the coffee shop. Or would he?

Jess is a 21 yo woman going on 35. She has her head on straight, is rooted, determined, confident and oh so cute. Jeff thinks she has the most beautiful smile he's ever seen. As a matter of fact he make a special trip every day into her coffee shop (and it's not for the terrible coffee...) just to see it. There are sparks in the air every time he see her, but when he sees her in the grocery store, with her hair down, she is even more beautiful than he remembers. So he asks her to dinner at his home, the next evening. I liked this story even better than the first one (The Cop and the Girl From The Coffee Shop) I gave it a 5 star.

This was another good book to read but too short. After his secretary made an appearance at her house with the flowers I could imagine the drama over his career immediately becoming an issue. Plus meeting his family and moving in together would have been another issue. I really wish this story was carried out further as a full novel.

Joanna says

I don't know what to say. I read the title thinking this story is going to be very interesting in how they are going to over come there differences and i was excited to figure it out but i found the story fast passed and it skip-over all the problems they could have encountered. I was very disappointed and felt that the story was more like a summery to the book then it being the actual book.
